The Economy & Your Finances: New weekly unemployment claims fall nationwide, rise in California

Nearly 1.5 million laid-off U.S. workers applied for first-time unemployment benefits last week, a slight dip from the week before. Weekly numbers have been dropping for 12 consecutive weeks, indicating the job market is slowly beginning to stabilize. Still, these new unemployment claims surpassed economists’ predictions of 1.35 million new claims last week, and the decrease from the week prior was very small, suggesting the job market is not sprinting back as states reopen.

Consumer spending rose 8.2 percent in May from a month earlier, supported primarily by massive fiscal stimulus injections in April. Given the recent surges in new virus infections across the country, it is not clear if Americans will continue to spend at May’s pace in the coming months.

Congressional Democrats have urged Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell to immediately start talks on another coronavirus relief bill. McConnell has indicated the Senate will not consider additional legislation until after the July Fourth recess, at which point lawmakers will have access to the Labor Department’s June jobs report. President Trump has said he would support sending Americans more direct aid as part of the next coronavirus relief package.

In California, new unemployment claims rose last week to 287,354 new claims up from 241,424 the week before. As of last Thursday, the California Employment Development Department had processed 6.7 million claims since March 14 and paid approximately $33.5 billion in benefits. With many applicants reporting they have not yet received any benefits despite having filed claims weeks ago or complaining about having trouble getting through to EDD representatives on the phone, lawmakers are increasingly calling on Governor Newsom to intervene and audit the department. Job losses have affected women and people of color in California particularly hard; during the first three months of the pandemic, employment for Black and Latinx women fell more than three times the employment decline for white men.

A recent UCLA Anderson Forecast predicts California’s economic trajectory will look like a “Nike swoosh”: A sharp plunge followed by a gradual rise, not returning to its late-2019 peak until 2023.

The Treasury Department announced on Monday that taxpayers must file their federal returns by July 15. An automatic extension through October 15 is available, but must be specifically requested.

The Small Business Administration (SBA) published new regulations for the Paycheck Protection Program (PPP) stating that a borrower may submit a loan forgiveness application any time on or before the maturity date of the loan, including before the end of the covered period, if the borrower has used all of the loan proceeds for which the borrower is requesting forgiveness. The new SBA regulations also state that a borrower may request that the SBA review the lender’s decision regarding forgiveness of the loan in the event that the lender determines that the borrower is not eligible for forgiveness. For more information, see the FAQs on SBA Loans for Agents and SBA Loans for Brokers on the C.A.R. coronavirus microsite.

Last night, the Senate passed a five-week PPP extension. The deadline to apply for a PPP loan was previously June 30, but the Senate voted to extend the deadline until August 8. The House and President must approve the legislation for the extension to take effect.

The Market & Industry: Buyer demand rebounding

On a year-over-year basis, nationwide home sales were down 26.6 percent in May 2020 from May 2019; the May numbers are expected to be the cyclical bottom, with NAR predicting sales will rebound strongly in the coming months. This trajectory can be seen in pending home sale numbers, which spiked 44.3 percent in May compared with April. Even so, supply constraints could slow this momentum.

Buyer demand seems to have rebounded, with mortgage applications up 18 percent from this time last year. A survey from Helitech found 37 percent of buyers are willing to risk exposure to COVID-19 if it meant securing the right home. And according to Redfin, a record high of 27 percent of home shoppers are searching for homes in different metro areas, looking to relocate to more affordable, less dense areas.

After pausing all homebuying on March 17, RedfinNow has been reintroducing cash offers in select markets; last Friday, RedfinNow resumed operations in Dallas, San Antonio, Los Angeles and Orange County. Keller Williams has also renewed focus in its iBuying division, announcing last week that Keller Offers is ending its exclusive partnership with Offerpad and will now be allowing other investors to make all-cash offers on the homes it represents.

Meanwhile, the share of mortgages in forbearance dipped for a second straight week. And on Monday, the Federal Housing Finance Authority (FHFA) said multifamily property owners currently in forbearance can extend the payment suspension period for three more months on loans secured by Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac.

Around the State: Cases spike across the state

California is facing troubling spikes in coronavirus cases and hospitalizations statewide. Increases in hospitalizations statewide can largely be attributed to increases in Ventura, Orange, San Bernardino and Riverside counties. This new surge appears to be driven in part by an increase in the number of young people getting sick. With the percentage of people testing positive for COVID-19 in California rising in the past two weeks, Governor Newsom has blamed birthday parties, children’s playdates and other private gatherings.

As of yesterday at 10:07 p.m., cases in California numbered 232,273 and deaths had hit 6,088. Current statistical modeling predicts if this trajectory continues, California will reach 16,000 COVID-19 deaths by October 1, 2020, with half of those deaths coming from Los Angeles County. The California Department of Public Health is actively monitoring the situation in 19 counties that are experiencing spikes. California has the second-highest number of coronavirus cases in the country, behind New York (393,454). Yesterday, Director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases Dr.
Anthony Fauci said he wouldn’t be surprised if new nationwide cases rise by 100,000 a day in the near future.

Across the state, counties are having to pause or reverse their reopening processes. Hospitals are nearing surge capacity in San Bernardino. San Francisco paused its planned reopening of barbershops, nail salons and outdoor bars, initially scheduled for this past Monday. Hospitalizations haven’t been this high in the Bay Area since May. Governor Newsom recommended bars closed in eight counties and ordered them closed in seven — including Los Angeles, where residents have had difficulty obtaining coronavirus tests and experts predict two to three weeks remain before hospitals run out of beds. Surging cases in San Diego have officials doubting whether UC San Diego will be able to reopen as planned for its fall quarter. Governor Newsom has hinted at renewed restrictions statewide if this trajectory continues.

Tourist destinations have also been walking back their plans to reopen. Yosemite National Park canceled campsite reservations through July two weeks after reopening them to the public, and Disneyland has delayed its reopening plans indefinitely.

Newsom has doubled down on his mandate that all Californians wear masks in public, warning that counties that fail to abide by these rules could face funding cuts.

Health Check-Up: U.S. cases undercounted

Data from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) reveals that coronavirus infection numbers in the United States have been vastly undercounted and could be 10 times higher than reported. Of cases that have been recorded, 11 percent have been linked to nursing homes—as have 43 percent of all recorded COVID-19 deaths.

For Californians seeking healthcare, Covered California has extended its special enrollment deadline such that anyone who meets the eligibility requirements can apply through July 31.

A new study has revealed that even asymptomatic carriers of COVID-19 could sustain temporary lung damage from the disease. No one is quite sure how many asymptomatic carriers there are or who is more likely to be an asymptomatic carrier: In a test of nursing homes, only 4 percent of people testing positive were asymptomatic, whereas 88 percent of COVID-positive pregnant women admitted to a hospital during the New York City outbreak had no symptoms.
